The girl had fainted quite away by the time he had reached her. Flinging down his unlucky rifle the young man devoted himself to her recovery with peculiar gentleness and reverence, and with an assidu-ity that speedily recalled her to consciousness. She opened her eyes upon the strangers, blushed vividly, and arose steadily to her feet, retreating a few paces.
"A perfect little queen!" cried the gentleman who had before spoken. "Who would have dreamed of finding such a magnificent little beauty in this wilderness! I say, Glenham-"

The girl's pale face flushed scarlet. "Pardon," she said, speaking in English, with an accent as pure as that of the gentleman, "but I understand English."

The two young men were, for the moment, covered with confusion. Then the one who had been called Glenham addressed himself to the young lady, avowed himself the author of her injury, lamented his own awkwardness, and begged to be permitted to examine her arm to ascertain the extent of her wound, and to endeavor to alleviate her suffering.

His evident sorrow, his chivalric courtesy, impressed the girl, who quietly gave assent, and permitted him to examine her arm. "My friend, in his chagrin at his awkspoken. "Permit me to remedy this defiduction with a bow, and responded: "I fear that I cannot lay claim to the same nationality with yourself. I am Cecil Rosse, the niece of Herr Brocken, the Lutheren pastor of Zorlitz."

To the girl, reared in that accluded re-gion, seeing, besides her aged relative, only the rude peasants of Zorlitz, young Lord Glenham appeared a very demi-god.

He was strikingly handsome, with a distinguished presence. He was about twentyeight years of age, yet he retained a youthful freshness of feeling, was chivalrous and obscured his vision. Cecil took his arm and led the way by the forest-path in the direction of her home. A few minutes' walk brought them out upon the steep village street and very near the parsonage. As they entered the little gar-den-gate, the old housekeeper, Gretchen, came out to meet them with loud expressions of alarm at the evident weakness of her young mistress. She fairly worshipped the pastor's niece, and Occil forced a smile The pastor of this church a year or two and disengaged her arm from its support as

Both of the young men were the good pastor and his wife having gloried desperately in love with her, and each rein her keen intellect and in her thirst for solved, if possible, to win her for his wife. They seitled themselves comfortably at languages, music (for which she had a positive genius), drawing, and painting, and parsonage daily. Absorbed in his books, the Herr Pastor paid little heed to the visitors, whom Cecil entertained. June faded into July, and August came and went, and still the Englishmen lingered at Zorlitz. No one but sharp-eyed old Gretchen suspected a savorite resort of the young girl, and she that they were the lowers of "little Cecil," or saw the change in her young mistress.

"She loves the English lord," the old woman said to herself, well contented. "And "Ob, dear," she said, sighing, "I am so he loves her. The hard, evil look in his eyes attested to As the month of August drew to a close Lord Glenham began to make preparations preferring the safe shelter of the Zorlitz to quit Zorlitz, as he had to return home to keep his engagement with a party of guests whom he had invited to spend the month of troubles lying in wait for her in the great September with him at his shooting-box in the Scottish Highlands. On the eve of his departure he ealled upon Herr Brocken, avowed his love for Cecil, and asked for her hand in marriage, The old pastor was tation revealed the young nobleman a se-

Besides, she is too one year, leave her to me, and if, another summer, you still love Cecil, come and claim her. But now you must not speak to her of love. She is but a child-she is only seventeen."

Lord Glenham was forced to acquiesce in the old pastor's decision. Cecil was called in, and the earl took leave of her in her guardian's presence. His lordship's tongue was silenced upon the subject of love, but his eyes told the tale his lips had been forbidden to utter, and the girl's soul thrilled under his worshipping gaze.
"I am going away, Cecil," said his lordship, with a tenderness he could not repress. "I am going home to England, but I shall return next summer. Good-bye, Cecilgood-bye, my darling!" The sorrow in her sweet eye robbed him of his self-control. He caught her to his breast and showered kisses on her pure young face in an irrepressible agitation. Then, gently putting her from him, he wrung the pastor's hand and dashed from the house. An hour later Lord Glenham and Maldred Crafton left Zorlitz on their way to England, the latter promising to himself a speedy and secret return.

That evening, as the good old pastor sat alone in his study, meditating upon the great event of the day, the door opened and old Gretchen came in, bearing in one hand wardness, has forgotten to introduce him- a lighted candle, in the other a small packet, self," said the gentleman who had first upon which was impressed the London postmark.

Cecil Rosse was not sufficiently skilled in physiognomy to read the characters of these two men. She only knew that she liked Lord Glenham, and with her liking came an instinctive faith in him. Lean upon me-"It is scarcely necessary for me to repeat care and concern for her end herewith, Neither she nor you will ever hear from me again." There was no signature to this epistle.

Herr Brocken read it over the second time, and sighed heavily. "The unknown guardian washes his hands of Cecil," he muttered. "All connection between the girl and her early past is now completely severed. She will never solve the mystery; will never know her origin. I almost wish that I had not sent Lord Glenbam away, and yet I could not do otherwise. According to the traditions and usages of the world, a girl like Cecil, no matter how great her beauty, genius, and goodness, is no fitting wife for a great

I may not live another year, and there are things you ought to know. I will tell them to you now. Cecil, this handsome English lord asked me to-day for my consent to address you as your suitor.

The girl blushed and paled, and her eyes glowed with a swift and dazzling splendor. "What did you say, uncle?" she whispered, after a little pause.

"I bade him wait a year. I told him that you were too young to marry." "He loves me! He loves me!" Cecil said to herself softly, her glorious young beauty radiant as a star. "And he is coming back next year! Oh, uncle, I am the happiest girl in all the world to-night!"

The old pastor sighed and stroked her hair with a shaking hand. A great struggle was going on within him. At last a look of decision settled upon his careworn features, and with his trembling hand resting on Cecil's head he told her her history as far as he knew it. He also informed her that he had told it to Lord street. Glenham, and that it seemed to make him was a weariness in the drooping features that told of extreme physical weakness. "My child," said the old scholar, arousing himself with his former bewildered expression, "husb, dear, you pain me. I would have kept this from you if I had dared. Lord Glenham may come back. Goodness, beauty, and genius are of more value than ancestry. Put the letter in your pocket. It may prove a clue some day." He took from the desk a small packet, which he opened. "My good wife wrote out the history of your coming here," he said, "and here it s. We both signed it. And the good wife, who was clever with her pencil, made that night, after your guardian's departure, a sketch of his face. Here it is. It can per-

"The good wife thought not. But he might have been. Men can be very cruel to their own flesh and blood when they are supremely selfish. Keep the picture, dear. And now, Cecil, we must say good-night." Cecil knelt down beside him, and he laid his hands on her head and blessed her. Then he embraced her tenderly, as she arose, and dismissed her. The old pastor leaned back in his chair. His long, scanty locks fell around his venerable face, and his eyelids drooped wearily. "Poor little Cecil!" he said to himself vet without seeming to realize his words, 'I seem to have the gift of second-sight tonight. A terrible future yawns before her.

Poor little one! God shield her!" When morning dawned he still sat in his easy-chair, but his head was thrown back, the gentle smile was frozen on his features, which were rigid as marble. The old pastor had gone to join his good wife. He was dead, and Cecil Rosse was left alone in the world to meet the terrible perils in store for her!

The grief of Cecil when, the next morning, she discovered the old pastor sitting dead in his chair, was indescribable. She felt that she was now indeed alone, and without a guide in the world. But old Gretchen and all the neighbors comforted her, and by the time the funeral ceremonies had ended, and the affairs of the pastor's estate had been settled, she had recovered her usual elasticity of spirits, and had resolved upon her course, which was to go to England, accompanied by Gretchen, and see if she could not find some trace of her family. As they set out, old Gretchen, looking back at the forest-village through

Cecil seized the paper eagerly, and stared at the picture with great, devouring eyes.

It represented a young man with a fair, English face; a heavy, cruel mouth; small, bina eyes, the left one having a peculiar droop; and with a large mole on the left cheek. The face was hard, cold, and unpleasant, and Cecil shuddered as she studied it, feeling a quick sense of repulsion towards it.
